Ever Wonder Why?

February has 28 days because, to the Romans, the month was an afterthought. In the 8th century BCE, they used the Calendar of Romulus, a 10-month calendar that kicked the year off in March (with the spring equinox) and ended in December. January and February didn't even exist. Back then, winter was a nameless, monthless period that no one cared for much. (Planters and harvesters used the calendar as a timetable. To them, winter was useless and wasn't worth counting.) So for 61 days out of the year, Romans could ask "What month is it?" and you could correctly answer, "None!"

King Pompilius thought that was stupid. Why have a calendar if you're going to neglect one-sixth of the year? So in 713 BCE, he lined the calendar up with the year's 12 lunar cycles—a span of about 365 days—and introduced January and February which were added to the end of the calendar, making February the last month of the year. The months The Romans believed even numbers were unlucky, so Pompilius tried to make each month odd. But to reach the quota of 365, one month had to be even. February ended up pulling the short stick, probably because it was simply the last month on the list.
